Making it Official

By Judy Hodgson

hodgson@northcoastjournal.com

I remember well when I was editor of the Arcata Union in 1986. The Hadley family, which had owned the weekly for more than 50 years, sold the newspaper to a pair of investors from the Bay Area. I interviewed the new publisher, a guy from Nevada, and he said all the right things: “No changes, really. You have a great staff. No need to change anything.”

Right. Within two years, a lot changed, the paper was sold again and in the messy process I was fired. One of the reasons I was given was that I was “not friendly enough to the timber industry.” My response was, “Gee, they forgot to teach me that in journalism school,” as I packed my stuff into a cardboard box and headed to the door. Two years later, in 1990, we put out our first edition of the North Coast Journal of politics, people & art.

With this edition, I am officially retiring as publisher after 29 years. I will still serve as CEO of the company but I’m turning the title of publisher over to the guy who’s been doing the job anyway for the last few years, Chuck Leishman. Yes, we are naming a new publisher, but no — unlike the Union transition so many years ago — readers should not expect dramatic changes.

We hired Chuck as general manager in late 2012 to run the day-to-day operations. After a while, I started to work less and less, easing into semi-retirement. I gave up my office two or three years ago. Sometimes when I come in, there are employees I don’t exactly recognize. But I do know that the mission of the Journal remains unchanged — our commitment to the highest quality of journalism we can provide Humboldt readers every week and, now, every day online. The best coverage of arts and culture. And the best portfolio of high-end magazines to celebrate this great place we live.

Chuck and I were just arguing about who has been in the news business longer. I officially started as a reporter for the Union in 1981. By then Chuck — who went to Chico State University, majoring in journalism — was already working as a sales rep for the new Chico News & Review.

Chuck Leishman, the Journal’s new publisher.

Chuck moved on to Sacramento when the Sacramento News & Review launched. Later he became general manager of The Pitch in Kansas City and eventually publisher-owner of his own alt weekly, Birmingham Weekly.

We have a few other changes to our staff box to announce this week: Melissa Sanderson has been promoted to general manager, Kyle Windham to sales manager, Jonathan Webster to art director and last, but not least, Lynn Leishman to publisher of all our special publications, including Humboldt Cannabis Magazine and the quarterly Humboldt Insider. (The Leishmans, both experienced publishers, came as a set from Birmingham.)

Congratulations to those with new titles and duties. The Journal is also welcoming several recent hires: Zach Lathouris, social media coordinator; Cassie Curatolo, assistant special publication editor; and Iridian Casarez, staff writer.

And as long as we are announcing changes, readers should be aware of two new websites that recently launched — digital editions with complete archives of two of our popular glossy magazines — www.humboldtinsider.com and www.humboldtcannabismagazine.com.

As always, we appreciate your feedback.

It’s Greed!

Editor:

Citing a “survey of voters,” McKinleyville resident Edward Webb claims “we” feel helpless or are in denial over climate change, (Mailbox, Jan. 10). In reality, voter polls represent sharply divided minority-views demonstrated in last November’s election, despite the corrupt developer in the White House (“The Grifter In Chief,” Dec. 27).

A generation of bipartisan legislation has returned a Gilded Age to America, far worse than the last, further undermining voter turnout. The largest segment of America’s non-voting majority is ages 18 to 25, they’re rarely polled and are excluded from election turnout reports. Hard-hit by poverty, homelessness and decades of oppressive student debt, they are, nevertheless, the majority of protesters demanding a sustainable green economy. For two decades their demands have led to increasing academic offerings in environmental sciences at Humboldt State University, a nationwide phenomenon indicating the changes ahead.

Unfortunately, fear of economic inconvenience not seen since the Antebellum South, (AKA “greed,” not denial or helplessness), is protracting a profound crisis at the hands of bipartisan local, state and federal governments. For example, despite accelerating worldwide biodiversity collapse, rising tides and mass human migrations, Humboldt County supervisors have focused on serving corrupt local developers by unilaterally deregulating our county’s General Plan and Guiding Principles, courting violence by unleashing industrial marijuana onto our headwaters without requiring professional water carrying-capacity certification.

Parents, teachers, mentors and other lifelong participants in America’s corrupt, unsustainable culture are struggling to model the atonement required by today’s youth to forge a new path. Webb’s contribution to his health and the environment by eating less meat is a start, however, forgoing consumption of 1 ton of jet fuel to sample the sardines in Spain for 10 days is imperative, it’s this nation’s largest single source of carbon emissions and significant source of cancer-causing radiation at 30,000 feet.

Why I Marched

Editor:

I joined the Women’s March on Jan. 19 because it’s a unique global phenomenon, one of the most visible and effective demonstrations of the upwelling of the feminine principle — in all genders. This upwelling comes out of a natural human instinct for self-preservation. Our survival as a species, and certainly any peace and security we now have, are threatened by a disastrous and unsustainable dominator culture in which men dominate women, other men and Earth.

I needed to add my small spark to the millions across the planet and be ignited by them, as well. I needed, once again, the renewal the march gave me in 2017 and 2018. These last years have been a long, hard slog against a vicious pummeling from a crumbling, panicked patriarchy.

A flaw in the makeup of the planning committee could have been remedied in various ways — making sure the speakers this year and the planning committee next

Maybe the Sun Will Come Out Today

There is a time when the sound of wet tires on Harris Street
Comes as a surprise.
Gravity has worked its irresistible craft
On the water cycle,
Leaving carbuncles dangling from the tips of the potted spruce.
It goes on,
And green returns to the carpet.
It goes on,
and chimney smoke begins to fight its way upward through it.
It goes on,
and the streets are washed,
the gutters are scoured,
And the sweetgum's leaves' resistance is finally defeated.
Yet, it goes on.
Invisible vigor stirs the iris rhizomes
As the unfathomable art of water goes quietly about its business,
And I can't forget my gratitude.
Still, when the day comes
That the wet hiss fades
from the suserus of passing cars,
I'll be likewise moved
By the enormity of open skies.

— James Buschmann

year were suitably diverse, for instance. Canceling the march and attempting to deprive this community — including the entire range of our diversity — of the opportunity to join in a worldwide affirming and strengthening of the feminine spirit was a sad overreaction that only served to divide and weaken us.

I'm very grateful to Linda Atkins and Kathy Srabian for stepping in to make the Women's March happen Jan. 19.

Margaret Emerson, Arcata

A 'Social Change Oath'

Editor:

In light of the debacle surrounding the Women's March I am reminded of the Hippocratic Oath for physicians dating back to between the third and fifth centuries B.C.: "Into whatsoever houses I enter, I will enter to help the sick and I will abstain from all intentional wrong-doing and harm."

Perhaps the Hippocratic Oath could be amended and adopted by organizations devoted to social change. Something along the lines of, "Into whatsoever communities I enter, I will abstain from garbled messaging that garners national attention and makes my community appear to be a bunch of flippin' idiots."

Susan Pahl, Arcata

It Takes a Village

Editor:

Thanks to Thadeus Greenon for the excellent article on our company ResolutionCare ("Woo-Woo and the Hammer," Jan. 17).

One point that perhaps got lost in translation is that the team we work with extends well beyond our company. We are not a lonely ragged band of heroes delivering care where none dare to tread. We work intimately with all the social service agencies and healthcare providers in the counties we serve. We could not do this work without that collaboration.

Despite the severe lack of healthcare providers in Northern California, we have some really incredible organizations and people working to improve the health and quality of life in our service areas. We understand we are just one more piece of that complex puzzle.

So, on behalf of our team, thank you again for highlighting ResolutionCare and forgive us for insisting the light shine wider than our one small company.

Lauri Rose, Bridgeville

Useful?

Editor:

Coastal wetlands are critical when it comes to wildlife habitat and coastal protections. However, the filling of protected dune wetlands that follows vegetation removal programs has been happening unregulated and unmonitored for decades. If the plants being torn out are simply left to grow, peer-reviewed studies show wetland areas are actually created along with dune forest habitat. Wetlands and dune forests provide coastal protections and wildlife habitat far more so than destabilized sand.

While the Coastal Commission staff is aware of these wetland impacts, they continue to turn a blind eye.

Conversely, when a rancher or land manager wants to repair or strengthen a levy, the hurdles become almost impossible even though the importance of doing so is clear ("Officials Brace for Sea Level Rise," Jan. 17).

The Bay Trail will also need considerable mitigations because filling coastal freshwater wetlands is a part of the trail building plan. Unfortunately, it appears that valuable freshwater wetlands at the Lanphere Wildlife area will be converted to salt marsh in those mitigations. I wish I could tell you that makes sense.

Our community is going to have to make a choice. Are coastal freshwater wetlands as valuable as we say they are or should we keep converting them into salt marsh or mud flats and fill them with destabilized sand just because we want a trail and some people don't like certain plants?

It is unfortunate that the obsession with native vs. non-native plants has blinded many land managers. Of course, with ongoing climate changes the actual definition of "native" remains elusive. Whether a plant or animal is useful is a much better question.

Supes turn to community process after zoning outcry

By Elaine Weinreb

newsroom@northcoastjournal.com

Yielding to massive public pressure, the Humboldt County Board of Supervisors backed off from a giant re-zoning effort Jan. 15 and instead adopted a go-slow planning process that could take up to two years to implement.

The previous plan, which involved re-zoning thousands of parcels with minimal notice to the public, had evoked hours of angry public testimony and an implied threat of a lawsuit from the Humboldt Bay Municipal Water District.

In contrast, the new strategy involves a series of community planning meetings, with a special emphasis given to the McKinleyville, Blue Lake, Glendale and Willow Creek areas. The Planning and Building Department will be tasked with publicizing these meetings beforehand, which will include the McKinleyville Municipal Advisory Council, the Blue Lake Rancheria and several community service districts.

"I want to thank the board for taking the time ... and I want to commend the staff for what they've done here," said Fifth District Supervisor Steve Madrone. "I think it's been very responsive to the community's concerns. ... There's a lot of people who have come out to these hearings and asked that they be given a chance to engage. I think you've done that."

The Mercer-Fraser Co. gravel mining site in Glendale — a catalyst for much of the controversy over the zoning changes — will remain as ag land for the time being, to the relief of the many who had expressed concerns about the potential for contamination of the water district's Mad River intake wells, which provide the vast majority of the region's drinking water.

The upcoming planning meetings are slated to be interactive, rather than top-down, involving feedback from community leaders and residents alike. If necessary, portions of the updated General Plan could be changed, according to the staff report produced by the Planning and Building Department.

The planning department will also hold public meetings with the city councils of Blue Lake, Arcata, Eureka, Fortuna, Rio Dell and Trinidad, which have expressed concerns about the proposed changes over the last several months, as well as development in areas just outside their limits, legally defined as being within the cities' "spheres of influence."

The planners are also open to meeting with rural residents who already live within the boundaries of existing community area plans — most of which are decades old — but outside of incorporated cities, such as those created for Jacoby Creek, Trinidad/Westhaven and locations near Fortuna.

In addition, other, more generally-themed public hearings will occur. The first — planned for next month — will cover the language of the zoning amendments, explaining what terms such as "Timber Exclusive" and "Q-zone" mean. Another such meeting later in the spring will discuss proposed map changes for parcels outside of the focused community area plans.

The new planning strategy seemed to evoke a collective sigh of relief from both the supervisors and the general public, with the words "applaud," "thank" and "support" being frequently said. A few concerns, however, still existed.

Martha Spencer, a former county planner who is now with Food, Fibers and Flowers, an organization that represents small-market farmers, said she supported "slowing down the process."

"We're concerned about the many 'Unclassified' re-zonings that will occur," she told the supervisors earlier this month. "We want people to understand what's happening and what their rights are with their properties."

After concerns were raised, a new re-zoning process will take place, include for ag and "Unclassified" land. File

Spencer noted that open space policies and protecting ag lands were a particular priority, while also stating that neighbors of properties with zoning changes need to be notified because "it can be a concern."

Along similar lines, a Fieldbrook resident was worried that changes in timberland zoning would bring unwanted development to her neighborhood.

"One of the 100-acre parcels that they're looking at, Green Diamond is interested in making it a 5-acre parcel change, and that's my back yard," she said.

Tina Christiansen, representing the Humboldt Association of Realtors, said she thought that the update process had gone on quite long enough.

"I have spent 15 years on this General Plan," she said. "I hear voices from the future and voices from the past that both understand we went through a very intense process. ... To change that process now, I think that we need to look into this, we need to have a voice in this, and we will."

With a brief motion by Second District Supervisor Estelle Fennell, with Third District Supervisor Mike Wilson noting, "I think that just about covers everything," Fourth District Supervisor Virginia Bass seconded the motion, which passed unanimously.

The supervisors then approved three individual re-zoning requests, which were generally regarded as non-controversial, including one for the Redwoods Rural Health Center and another for the Save the Redwoods League.

Supervisors also selected a new at-large member of the Planning Commission to replace David Edmonds, who had resigned. Melanie McCavour, an environmental consultant and lecturer at Humboldt State University, was selected for the job.

She was competing with a long list of other applicants, including current Fifth District Commissioner Ben Shepherd, who expects to be replaced soon. McCavour is currently on the Arcata Planning Commission, but will resign that post to serve the county.

At the end of the day, McKinleyville resident Twyla Sanchez summed up what many other speakers had said about the decision to slow down the zoning process.

"I was very excited to hear that we were heard at the supervisors' meeting, and the planning commission folks heard the community, because so many times you feel like you're not heard," Sanchez said. "You heard us. Thank you."

Elaine Weinreb is a freelance journalist. She tries to re-pay the state of California for giving her a degree in environmental studies and planning (Sonoma State University) at a time when tuition was still affordable.

Week in Weed

A Low Barr and a Cashed Bowl

By Thadeus Greenson

thad@northcoastjournal.com

In case you've been living under a rock — or just glaze over at the mere mention of Russia — the Senate Judiciary Committee held a confirmation hearing last week for President Trump's attorney general nominee William Barr. While the vast majority of news coverage of the hearing focused on whether Barr would recuse himself from the Russia investigation and how he feels about special prosecutor Robert Mueller, Barr said some interesting things about cannabis.

For the civic novices among us, or those with incredibly short attention spans, the U.S. attorney general has a lot of sway over legal cannabis, an industry that netted $10.4 billion in domestic sales last year. After all, cannabis remains illegal under the federal Controlled Substances Act, meaning the U.S. Department of Justice has the power to wreak havoc on the industry and the more than three dozen states that have legalized cannabis in some form by federally prosecuting folks acting legally under state law.

Barr's predecessor, Jefferson Beauregard Sessions III, set the industry into a tizzy last January when he rescinded a memo from the Obama administration's justice department directing U.S. attorneys not to prosecute cases involving cannabis businesses operating in compliance with state laws.

During his confirmation hearing, Barr — a notable drug war crusader in previous administrations — made clear that he, like Sessions before him, is no fan of the sticky-icky and supports blanket federal prohibition. But unlike Sessions, Barr pledged not to go after companies relying on the Obama-era memo for guidance or to "upset settled expectations" in the industry.

Further, Barr said it's "untenable" to continue under a system in which cannabis is federally prohibited but the Department of Justice simply looks the other way when it is permitted under state law. Congress simply needs to pass a law that defers to states on the issue or allow the DOJ to enforce federal laws as they are on the books.

"It's incumbent on Congress to make a decision," he testified.

The global elite are making their annual pilgrimage to the Swiss alpine town of Davos this week for the World Economic Forum and they have some new, hip friends with them. And they might be holding.

The Financial Post reported that a host of cannabis company executives and politicians-turned-weed-lobbyists are heading to the Swiss alps to attend a three-hour lunch at a restaurant accessible only by cable car that's being billed as Davos' first ever "Cannabis Conclave."

Those attending the three-course lunch will hear presentations from "leading cannabis executives and investors," including former Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak, who now chairs the board for medical cannabis company InterCure, and Bruce Linton, CEO of Canopy Growth Corp., the Canada-based outfit billed as the world's largest cannabis company.

Cannabis' inclusion on the agenda of the annual get together of the richest, most powerful people in the world is obviously a big deal. It also should be taken for what it is: an instance of billionaires looking to expand investment portfolios in rapidly developing markets rather than some global recognition of the herb's power or revisiting the social injustices of prohibition.

Meanwhile, in the United States, where almost two-thirds of the population live in states where marijuana is legalized in some form, a major television network has rejected an offer of $5 million for 30 seconds of airtime to promote the drug's medical benefits.

CNN Business reports that CBS has refused to let Acreage Holdings buy a 30-second spot during this year's Super Bowl for an ad focused on how medical cannabis has helped patients cope with pain, including a child suffering from epileptic seizures. Acreage President George Allen told CNN the company developed the ad, which doesn't plug any of the company's products, "in the spirit of a public service announcement" because "it's our responsibility to advocate on behalf of our patients."

According to the report, CBS has declined to comment publicly but has a policy against accepting any cannabis-related advertising.

View this how you like. But it seems very interesting that while global elites plot how to expand the international cannabis industry and bleed it for profits, America's largest television event — which is centered around watching young men inflict permanent brain damage on one another amid repeated displays of patriotism, militaristic might and unrestrained capitalism — has deemed cannabis still too taboo to talk about. ●

On the March

Humboldt County residents hit the streets en masse Jan. 19 and 21, first for the resuscitated Eureka Women's March then for the People's Rally and March for Justice, which culminated at the Eureka NAACP's annual celebration of the life and legacy of Martin Luther King Jr. at the Adorni Center. Local photographer Mark McKenna was on scene to capture both events for the Journal. Rescuing the Coasties: As the federal government shutdown crept into its second month, the city of Eureka — one of 21 official Coast Guard Cities in the nation — launched an effort to help the 250 or so local Coast Guard members who are currently working without a paycheck. A GoFundMe account raised more than $12,000 in five days and bins at city hall filled with donations. Of course, the Coasties aren't the only federal workers left in a lurch, and a host of local businesses have announced discounts for federal employees. Storm Surge: The North Coast was pummeled by heavy rain and high surf last week, with Shelter Cove bearing the brunt Jan. 17, when homes were damaged by massive waves pounding the coast. The Shelter Cove Fire Department reported that eight waterfront homes were damaged by the high surf, which broke windows and flooded floors. "We had to put life jackets on to walk around [to access damage]," said fire department spokesperson Cheryl Antony. "We've never seen waves like this before." The old growth redwood grove located in Jedediah Smith Redwoods State Park, which has become imperiled since its "discovery" two decades ago, will soon be accessible by a 1,300-foot-long elevated walkway linking the grove to an existing trail thanks to a massive fundraising effort. ‘We’re Coming Home’

The unprecedented return of Indian Island to the Wiyot Tribe

By Thadeus Greenson
thad@northcoastjournal.com

It was an unusual request for the drab, staid confines of Eureka City Council Chambers.

“Do I have time to sing you a song?” she asked from the podium.

“Sure,” then Mayor Frank Jager replied.

With that, Cheryl Seidner, a Wiyot tribal elder, clad in a traditional knit cap, tilted her head back, eyes closed, and began to sing. As the words of “We’re Coming Home” sung in Wiyot began to fill the room, slowly, one by one, the crowd rose to its feet. City staff followed suit, then members of the city council, until the entire room stood in rapt attention. When the song came to a close, Councilmember Kim Bergel turned away, dabbing tears from her eyes.

The moment underscored the gravity of the action the council took a few minutes later, when it voted unanimously to declare more than 200 acres of city-owned land on Indian Island “surplus property” and directed the city manager to negotiate its return to the Wiyot Tribe, for whom the island was home for at least 1,000 years, according to an archeologist, and since time immemorial, according to the tribe. But in Wiyot culture the island represents more than an ancient village site or a historical homeland — it’s the physical and cultural center of the universe, a place with the spiritual power to bring balance to all else.

Tribal Chair Ted Hernandez underscored this when he addressed the council that evening, saying he refused to call the island — named Duluwat in the Wiyot language and encompassing the villages of Tuluwat and Etpidohl — “surplus property” as it was bureaucratically being dubbed.

“It’s sacred land,” he said. “This is our sacred property. It’s where our ancestors are. That’s where our ancestors are buried, and that’s what we recognize it as. It’s the center of our world.”

Following the council’s direction given at that Dec. 4, 2018, meeting, City Manager Greg Sparks and the Wiyot Tribe are currently working to finish the paperwork needed to officially transfer ownership of the land back to the tribe. It’s a move without precedent across the nation, according to numerous experts consulted for this story, all of whom said that while there have been instances of the federal government, nonprofits and private entities returning land to tribes, Eureka appears to be the first local municipality to have ever taken such a step.

The largest of three islands in Humboldt Bay, Indian Island, comprised mainly of tidelands, is about 280 acres in size, stretching nearly a mile long and a half-mile wide. Up until the mid-1800s, the island was home to two Wiyot villages with Tuluwat serving as the site of the tribe’s annual World Renewal Ceremony, which drew members from throughout the region, where as many as 3,000 Wiyots lived in approximately 20 village sites scattered around Humboldt Bay.

A shell mound on the north-east end of the island was carbon dated back to the year 900 A.D. by a University of California Berkeley professor in 1918, indicating Wiyot inhabitation of the island went back at least a millennium.

But when whites were drawn to Humboldt County in the mid-1800s, they brought disease and violence that devastated the Wiyot people. By 1852, only about 800 Wiyot people remained in their traditional homeland, according to a 1993 article by Debra Webster for the Humboldt County Historical Society.

Like other tribes, the Wiyot Tribe was decimated by institutionalized violence, human trafficking and systemic genocide at the hands of their new white neighbors. The most famous of these atrocities occurred on Indian Island 159 years ago next month.

The Wiyot Tribe was in the midst of its World Renewal Ceremony in late February of 1860 when groups of white militiamen conducted three simultaneous raids on sleeping Wiyot villages on the south jetty, at the mouth of the Eel River and at Tuluwat, combining to kill as many 300 Wiyots before the sun rose.

Nowhere was the carnage fiercer than Tuluwat. The Wiyot men were away from the village gathering supplies for the renewal ceremony as the village's women, children and elders slept, when a still unidentified group of white men massacred them. Journalist Bret Harte documented the aftermath in grim, graphic detail for the Northern Californian newspaper:

"When the facts were generally known, it appeared that of the some 60 or 70 killed on the island, at least 50 or 60 were women and children," he wrote. "Neither age nor sex had been spared. Little children and old women were mercilessly stabbed and their skulls crushed with axes. When the bodies were landed at Union, a more shocking and revolting spectacle never was exhibited to the eyes of a Christian and civilized people. Old women, wrinkled and decrepit, lay weltering in blood, their brains dashed out and dabbled with their long gray hair. Infants scarce a span long, with their faces cloven with hatchets and their bodies ghastly with wounds. We gathered from the survivors that four or five white men attacked the ranches at about 4 o'clock in the morning. No resistance was made, it is said, to the butchers who did the work, but as they ran or huddled together for protection like sheep, they were struck down with hatchets."

In the aftermath of the massacre, the Humboldt Times opined that it should be blamed "on the troops of Fort Humboldt because they had not given complete protection to the settlers and the settlers were left no course except to take matters in their own hands." (Read more about the massacre in the Journal's Feb. 25, 2010, story "Genocide and Extortion.")

Survivors of the massacre sought "immediate asylum" at Fort Humboldt, according to Webster's article, but were soon relocated to Fort Terwer on the Klamath Reservation and then dispersed throughout the region.

By the time of the massacre, work was already underway to seize ownership of the island from the Wiyot people. In 1858, John T. Moore submitted a claim with the Federal Land Claims Office under the Swamp and Overflow Lands Act to take ownership of the island and received a "certificate of purchase" for the property in January of 1860, which he sold to Robert Gunther the following month, according to Webster's article.

With the Wiyot people killed or removed, the island would then endure more than a century of abuse. It was diked to drain the saltmarshes to create land for cattle grazing. A series of lumber mills left a toxic legacy, as did a dry dock boat-repair shop that operated on the island for 120 years. In the early 1900s, the island was home to the Sequoia Yachting and Boating Club, where Eureka's wealthy and elite would boat across the bay for days of swimming and picnicking and rollicking evening balls.

A fire destroyed the club in 1913, and another gutted Gunther's historic Victorian home on the island some decades later. The city of Eureka purchased ownership of about 250 acres of the island in the 1950s from Ida Bohn Gates, who'd sued Gunther's estate for the island in 1909. For decades, the island lay largely fallow, save for four private residences on its Eureka-facing side and an egret rookery on the opposite side. Over time, the egrets took on a mythic quality, becoming a symbol of the island's brutal legacy.

"The egrets, in graceful flight are the spirits of those who were massacred so long ago," reads an unattributed quote in a 1988 Humboldt Historian article by Virginia Sparks. "Loathe to give up their island, they hover near, keeping vigil while the island fulfills its time of mourning."

In the first months of 2014, running unopposed for his second term as Eureka's mayor, Jager found himself doing a lot of reading. He was researching his grandfather, a member of the Pottawatomi, a Great Plains tribe that fought alongside the French in the French and Indian War in the 1700s. In the aftermath of the war, the tribe was removed from its historic homelands and relocated to Oklahoma and Kansas.

That got Jager thinking about the removal of the Wiyot from Tuluwat, and Humboldt County's own legacy of genocide and theft. As mayor of Eureka and the grandfather of two Wiyot girls, he thought he could offer a simple gesture to heal old wounds, so he spent a weekend in mid-March drafting a letter to the tribe.

"In February 1860, 154 years ago, citizens from Eureka participated in what has been described as a massacre of unfathomable proportions," the letter began, going on to describe the attack on "that winter night long ago" when women and children were slaughtered. "As Mayor of Eureka, and on behalf of the city council and the people of Eureka, we would like to offer a formal apology to the Wiyot people for the actions of our people in 1860. Nothing we say or do can make up for what occurred on that night of infamy. It will forever be a scar on our history. We can, however, with our present and future actions of support for the Wiyot work to remove the prejudice and bigotry that still exist in our society today.”

The letter was released to the public before it underwent legal review by then City Attorney Cyndy Day-Wilson, which posed a problem. While many in the public found the letter a heartfelt and long-overdue apology to take responsibility and make amends for a more than century-and-a-half-old massacre, Day-Wilson saw a financial liability. While legal experts widely agreed that was nonsense — that apologizing for a crime carried out by unknown people 14 years before Eureka was officially incorporated would in no way expose the city to liability — the council followed Day-Wilson’s advice and edited the letter, removing mention of who attacked the Wiyot that day or anyone being sorry for it.

Jager’s letter had been gutted.

“Of all the things that happened when I was the mayor, that was probably the most disappointing,” he said, adding that some weeks later he traveled south to the Wiyot Tribe’s Table Bluff Reservation to address the tribal council and apologize to them as a private citizen.

Recollections of that meeting differ. Jager says he recalls apologizing and telling the council about how he hoped to see the city erect a monument on the island commemorating the massacre. But Hernandez, the Wiyot Tribal chair, says he recalls it differently.

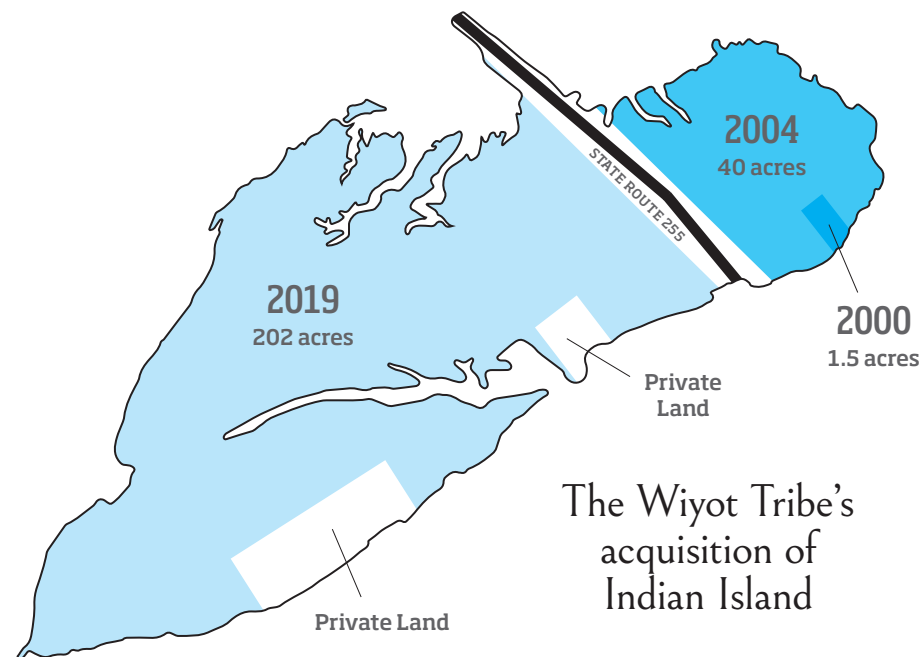

“He apologized and said, ‘What else can we do?’” Hernandez says. “We said, ‘Return the island.’”

What’s clear is that Jager’s gesture with the letter opened the door for something more, pushing both the tribe and the city to rethink what was possible.

“For him to come to the tribe and to apologize, I thought that was courageous,” Seidner says. “I was happy that evening.”

A few months later, Natalie Arroyo and Kim Bergel won seats on the Eureka City Council. One of the first things Arroyo did after being sworn in later that year was to travel to Table Bluff to address the Wiyot Tribe. Arroyo says she’d worked closely with the tribe in her capacity at the Redwood Community Action Agency on some grant funding efforts to build a smokehouse on tribal land. Once elected, she wanted to see if it was anything the city could do to build a better government-to-government relationship with the tribe.

“They said, ‘Well, please give us back Indian Island,’” Arroyo recalls with a chuckle, adding that at the time she didn’t even realize the island was within the city’s jurisdiction, much less under the city’s ownership.

Seidner, meanwhile, had already been in Bergel’s ear on the subject. Unbeknownst to anyone, the return of Indian Island was quickly becoming a reality.

Sitting in the cultural office of the Wiyot Tribe’s headquarters on Table Bluff, Seidner says she’s been working to see Indian Island returned to the Wiyots her entire life. She knew it would happen, she says, but didn’t think she’d live to see it.

Growing up, Seidner says she first learned of the island and the massacre from her mother — “her people were from the bay,” she says — when she was about 5. Immediately, Seidner says, she started picturing the island’s return.

“When I was 10 years old in fourth grade, Mrs. Greg asked who discovered America,” she recalls. “Some little boy said, ‘Christopher Columbus.’ I stuck my arm up and said, ‘No. The Wiyot people were already here.’”

Seidner tells the story, in part, to emphasize the fact that the Wiyot people have never left. “We’re here,” she says. “We aren’t shadows today. We are not forgotten.”

Nor have they forgotten the island, or its importance as the physical and cultural center of their universe. The fact is, Seidner says, the Wiyot have been working toward this day for a very long time. She talks about her uncle Albert James suggesting in 1970 that the tribe push for the return of the island, of the tribe’s lawsuit against the federal government in the 1980s that resulted in it gaining its tribal status.

In 1996, after she was elected to the tribal council and became chair, Seidner herself put getting the island back at the forefront of the tribe’s agenda. When the city put 1.5 acres of the island, a parcel that included Tuluwat, up for sale for $100,000 in the 1990s, Seidner pushed to make the purchase a priority.

She recalls one day in 1998 when she was on the Humboldt State University campus selling fundraising posters for $10 apiece and asked a professor to buy one. The next day, he returned in a suit and tie and asked Seidner to sit down. He’d talked to his wife, he said, and they agreed to match any donations up to $40,000 toward the purchase of the sacred village site.

A handful of months later, Seidner says she was speaking about the efforts to purchase Tuluwat during a conference of the National Congress of American Indians. When she finished addressing the crowd, a man stood up with a $100 bill in his hand and urged the few hundred people in attendance to match. Seidner says she raised almost $40,000 that day.

The tribe went on to hold auctions and events, and sold T-shirts, baked goods and Indian tacos. After missing a purchase deadline by a couple of days, it sold more until it reached the now $106,000 needed to purchase the 1.5 acres, signing the transfer deed in 2000. A handful of years later, the city donated an additional 40 acres to the tribe, which secured a variety of grants to clean up toxic contamination from lumber mills and a shipyard. In 2014, tribal members gathered on Tuluwat to finish the World Renewal Ceremony that had been interrupted by the massacre, the first step toward bringing balance back to the universe.

“My great uncle Irving James used to be a lightweight boxer,” Seidner says. “He used to say, ‘Every time I got knocked down, I got back up.’ I look at the tribe and we’re the same way. We’ve been knocked down a lot of times in our history but we always get up.”

In the weeks since that December meeting when the Eureka City Council formalized its intent to return the island and directed the city manager to get it done, Hernandez says he’s gotten a steady stream of phone calls and emails from other tribes or tribal organizations with a single question: “How’d you guys do it?” Arroyo says she’s received similar inquiries from the National League of Cities and other municipalities.

It’s clear Eureka and the Wiyot Tribe are on the cusp of something special.

Bob Anderson, the director of the Native American Law center at the University of Washington School of Law who for six years served under Interior Secretary Bruce Babbitt, providing legal advice on issues of Indian law and sovereignty, says what's being done is simply without precedent. While there are many examples of the federal government returning stolen lands — like giving 48,000 acres back to the Taos Pueblo Indians — or of a private entity, nonprofit or land trust acting similarly, he's not aware of a single instance of a local municipality returning land to a local tribe absent a lawsuit.

"I think it's a big deal," he says. "It sets an important precedent for other communities that might be thinking about doing this. They can say, 'Yes, it's been done before in California.' It really sets a positive tone for relations between tribes and local governments, which have very often been very strained.

"This is a significant example of sort of forward-looking, modern good relationships between tribal government and non-tribal governments," Anderson continues. "It seems to me this could be a shining example of what's possible. It's very important to Indian Country."

While everyone involved in the transfer seems wary of celebrating too early — Seidner says she "won't be ecstatic until people's names are written on the documents" — it's also clear they view this as the beginning rather than the culmination. Hernandez and Seidner say the tribe is already fundraising, looking to raise $15,000 to hold a World Renewal Ceremony on the island in 2020. Tim Nelson, the tribe's natural resources director, is already working on plans to rid the island of invasive Spartina grass. Jager's successor Susan Seaman says she's bringing a proposal forward at the city's next council meeting aimed at formalizing a "more collaborative" relationship with the Wiyot Tribe that will give it "a stronger voice at the table" in the city.

Careful to note that the return of the island is the fruit of generations of Wiyot work, Hernandez says the tribe is just focused on taking care of the island, "bringing it back to health." Asked if the tribe is entertaining the idea of trying to get back the private property on the island, too, to own it in its entirety, Hernandez chuckles and shakes his head.

"That's individuals' homes," he says. "We know what it's like to be taken off our land. Why would we do that to someone else?"

Asked what it will feel like to set foot on the island once it is returned to the tribe, Hernandez takes a deep breath.

"I imagine what it will be like and I just get this sensational feeling," he says. "Ancestors — you can feel their presence there. It's an amazing feeling. You don't want to leave. You're just absorbing it and feeling the power it has."

In the words of that unattributed myth in the Humboldt Historian, the island's period of mourning is almost over. The Wiyot are returning home. ●

Celery and leeks inspired by the ancients.

Celery at Center Stage

Braised with leeks

By Simona Carini

tabletalk@northcoastjournal.com

An ingredient of Italian soffritto, French mirepoix and the Cajun holy trinity, celery is rarely at center stage in a recipe. We'll change that in 2019.

Celery has a long history that goes back to the Egyptians, Greeks and Romans. A National Geographic article describes what Howard Carter, the archaeologist who discovered King Tutankhamun's tomb (c. 1323 B.C.E.) saw in 1922: "When Carter removed the lid of the outermost coffin, he found a linen shroud covered in plant remains — strings of olive, willow and wild celery leaves, strips of papyrus entwined with lotus petals and cornflowers, and a wreath of cornflowers laid at the head."

Much closer to us in time and space is a historical marker erected in Kalamazoo, Michigan, about Kalamazoo celery: "A Scotsman, named Taylor, grew the first celery in Kalamazoo in 1856. Diners at the Burdick Hotel regarded it with curiosity. Cornelius De Bruyn, a gardener, who came here from The Netherlands in 1866, developed the modern type of celery from the earlier soup celery. Other Dutch farmers by 1872 were turning the Kalamazoo mucklands into fields of celery. J.S. Dunkley sold medicines and condiments made of celery. Soon Kalamazoo celery was known the nation over. Michigan has been a leading celery producer ever since."

Today California is the top U.S. producer of celery for the fresh market and for processing, followed by Michigan, though production moved to other cities in Michigan when Kalamazoo's white or "bleached" celery dipped in popularity. (For the interested, searching for images of Kalamazoo celery brings up a lot of historical records, including my favorite: the Kalamazoo Celery Co's letterhead, in which each letter is shaped from a plant or a rib of the plant).

Besides celery (Apium graveolens var. dulce), there are two other cultivars of Apium graveolens used in the modern kitchen: celeriac (also called celery root) and leaf celery (Chinese celery, whose stems are thinner than those of Western celery, and curved into round, hollow stalks).

The celery stalks, or ribs, emerge from the celery plant crown at soil level and are actually petioles or leaf stalks (the petiole is a stalk that attaches a leaf to the plant stem). A celery leaf encompasses the stiff leaf base at soil level, the stalk and the lamina at the top. The latter is what is generally referred to as the leaves of the celery plant.

While I am not a fan of raw celery, I like cooked celery and always have. When she made ragù (the Italian meat and tomato sauce for pasta), my mother would use carrot and celery cut in large pieces, then take them out. I intercepted the vegetables and ate them. When she made bollito (boiled meat), the vegetables she added to the water (carrot, celery, onion) ended up on my plate.

A recipe for boiled celery and leeks in the ancient cookbook De Re Coquinaria (On Cooking, aka, Apicius, compiled in the late 4th to early 5th century) inspired me to experiment. My recipe for braised celery and leeks is quite different from the ancient one, but I owe to it the suggestion to pair the two vegetables in a dish that has become a personal favorite.

Ancient Roman recipes use garum as condiment, a fermented fish sauce, which I substitute with anchovy fillets. While anchovies provide a distinctive nuance, besides salt, they can be omitted to make a vegan version of the dish. If you are not sure whether you like anchovies, start by adding one fillet to the dish and add the other one if your palate would like a stronger flavor.

Besides as a side dish, you can use the braised celery and leeks as stuffing for roasted squash, together with some cooked sausage meat (like mild Italian variety).

Braised Celery and Leeks

Serves 3-4.

8 ounces leek, clean weight (after the dark green leaves have been cut away and saved for stock or broth)
8 ounces celery, clean weight, diced small
3 tablespoons extra-virgin olive oil
1 teaspoon fresh thyme leaves
½ teaspoon sweet paprika
1-2 anchovy fillets in olive oil (optional)
Fine sea salt, to taste
2 tablespoons finely chopped celery leaves for garnish

Cut the leeks in half lengthwise and slice into 1/8-inch thick half moons. Rinse them in a colander, then place them in a bowl and fill it with cold water. With your hands, swirl the leeks to clean them well, then scoop them out of the water with a sieve or slotted spoon and drain them in the colander.

Warm up the olive oil in a cast-iron skillet or pot over medium heat. Add the leeks, stir well and cook for 1-2 minutes.

Add the celery and thyme leaves, stir well and cook for 1-2 minutes. Sprinkle the paprika on the vegetables and stir well. Cover the skillet or pot and cook on gentle heat until the vegetables are tender, stirring every now and then. (Add some warm water, if needed, to keep the vegetables moist.)

Cut the anchovy fillets into small pieces and add them to the vegetables. Stir well to blend.

Remove from heat, sprinkle with the celery leaves, give a final stir and serve warm. ●

Border Dispute

Native Gardens at NCRT

By David Jervis

frontrow@northcoastjournal.com

Neighbors can be odd. Next-door neighbors even more so. You're not under the same roof, like siblings. But you are expected to get along with them, albeit for reasons of geography rather than genetics, and, like family, you don't always get to choose them.

In the comedy Native Gardens by Karen Zacarias, the first offering of the calendar year from North Coast Repertory Theatre, the purchase of a house in a historic, upscale suburb of Washington, D.C., means Pablo del Valle (Victor Parra) and his pregnant wife Tania (Amy Beltran), find themselves living the dream, but with a caveat. Just over a chainlink fence with some climbing ivy on it are Virginia and Frank Butley (Denise Ryles and Scott Q. Marcus), an older couple who have lived in the neighborhood for some time and take great pride in their home and every inch of their lot. The Butleys invite Pablo and Tania over for some wine in their immaculate backyard, as neighbors do. Pablo, an associate at a big-shot law firm, has made the impulsive move of inviting the whole office — partners and all — to a barbecue the following week, in time for which he and Tina would like to see the aforementioned fence replaced.

Now, neighbors (myself included) deal with fencing stuff like this all the time in prosaic fashion. But that would not make for a very engaging night at the theater. Native Gardens adds interesting complications, even if it's a sometimes uneven comic experience. There are problems with replacing the fence in time for the planned barbecue. Among these are Frank's longstanding obsession with winning a coveted award for best garden in the neighborhood and Pablo's discovery, after looking at the plans for their lot filed with the city, that the true dividing property line is 2 feet into the Butleys' yard. This last issue necessitates work by a surveyor with tags and plans for a new fence along the correct boundary — all threatening doom for Frank's beloved, award-aspiring bed of tulips — in time for the upcoming weekend.

Putting aside the vexing distraction that Zacarias' play exists in a world in which city surveyors find the time to come out the following day and contractors can do estimates and begin work within the week, Native Gardens does have a lot of good ideas for an audience to take in. Other than talk of walls, fences, barriers, feuding neighbors and attempts at understanding and compromise, there's even more going on: Pablo and Tania are Latino but their backgrounds aren't what many white Americans expect. He comes from a wealthy Chilean family and chose to live in the U.S. after attending boarding school, while she hails from New Mexico, part of a family that's lived in America for more than a century, and speaks very little Spanish (other than a few choice curse words).

These distinctions are lost on the Butleys, who fit the bill as NPR-listening, wine-sipping, upper-middle class baby boomers — the kind of people these days called coastal elitists, although in the play they are pegged as moderate Republicans. Really, their politics are less important than their love of azaleas and other fancy invasive species, a fixation that deepens when Frank finds out Tania plans to grow a native garden ("But they're just ... weeds!"). You could say Frank and Virginia are portrayed rather broadly and cartoonishly, but that might depend on your neighbors.

As director, Michelle Purnell has a fine hold on a play that has a lively interchange of yelling and pronouncements throughout (and scenic designer Diana Lynn oversees a great stage's worth of fences, yards, decks and flowers), and still Native Gardens doesn't always hit its marks. There is a great, talky, provocative scene toward the end of the play between Beltran and Ryles, but it exists amid some fits and starts of pacing and an ending that's too pat (and predictable). But let's face it, for a production, there's good timing and then there's great timing. Native Gardens touches not just on borders but also what we think we know and don't know about neighbors, the idea of who "owns" land and who doesn't, and who or what is indigenous or invasive. Whatever its faults, this is a play for this year, this month and this week.

This week features a folk-heavy lineup of artists, as well as some odd ducks and assorted bright things. And because I have an interview with one of them elsewhere in this issue and an album review in the works, I am going to be a man of few words in this intro and simply wish you all a wonderful week in the waning wake of the Super Blood Wolf Moon.

Awwoooooooooooo!

Thursday

There's a modern folk and roots music show tonight at Phatsy Kline's at 7 p.m.

Margo Cilker is a Bay Area-based singer/songwriter who cuts her work from the patchwork cloth of current and yesteryear greats like Lucinda Williams and Woody Guthrie. Her band is on tour with similar Ore-Washington act An American Forrest and will be joined tonight by local folk string trio No Pardon. There's no cover at the door but the hat will be passed at some point and a $10 donation would sure warm the players up a bit.

Friday

Rosanne Cash is a woman who, over the course of 40 years of releasing records, writing books and playing concerts, has eclipsed her famous surname many times over with her formidable talent. That talent is for writing personal songs of darkness turned outwards and magnified universally until they have colored every listener with a sunglasses tint that reveals all the pain that the bright lights hide. She is one of the few living artists whose entire discography is rewarding. Tonight she comes to Eureka — a first — on the back of her latest release She Remembers Everything. She will be joined onstage at the Arkley Center for the Performing Arts with her life and musical partner John Leventhal for an expo of her truth-blackened beauties. 8 p.m. ($66). (Read more on page 17.)

If you crave American music but prefer the budget and the atmosphere of a local watering hole, look no further than the Kingfoot show tonight at the Logger Bar. The boys start it up around 9 p.m. and the show is free to all comers with a calm disposition and desire to carry on through the night.

Saturday

The Alibi hosts a dirty punk and folk affair late this evening at 11 p.m. Newish group The Bow-Legged Buzzards feature the fiddlin' and gravel-voiced talented bravado of front-fellow Phill Irvine, while The Bored Again is the greatest one-man bass playing punk band ever to be fronted by a guy named Dave. Just $3 gets you in the door and that's less than a gallon of gas for a higher-octane grade of fun.

Sunday

I'm not usually a fan of movie musicals and with very few exceptions I avoid the genre like anything else that floats in the confluence of the waters of maudlin sentiment and big production budgets. However, I am not made of stone and even though I am not made of felt and fabric either, I still love The Muppet Movie. Having no emotional reaction to The Rainbow Connection, especially the couplet "What's so amazing/that keeps us stargazing?" should be added to the Dark Triad test for psychopathy and if the antics of these Muppets don't make you laugh out loud then I have no idea what will. Check out Kermit and company at The Arcata Theatre Lounge this evening at 6 p.m. for a revisit of their big screen debut ($5).

Monday

Arrington de Dionysio is the brains as well as embouchure behind the free and world jazz protest act This Saxophone Kills Fascists. He returns to The Outer Space tonight at 7 p.m. to blow down the walls of the proverbial modern American Jericho with his godly horn. Joining him will be local sound collective Medicine Baul as well as Arcata's up and coming abstract surf band Sue and the Namies ($6).

Tuesday

Violinist Kev Marcus and violist Wil B. form an instrumental hip-hop duo from Florida called Black Violin. Both men are classically trained musicians who favor a portmanteau of beats, elegant bars and musical passages. The resulting sound has a good amount of spectacle to it but never gets lost in kitsch or mired in novelty, and the group is very popular both in the studio and on stage. Rounding out its touring band are drummer Nat Stokes and DJ SPS. Hear them all at the Arkley Center for the Performing Arts at 7 p.m. ($39, $15 students).

Wednesday

As many quotes as there are about music nourishing the soul and giving meaning to our lives, there are just as many less flowery and more matter-of-fact sentiments about the importance of eating well and its effect on good health. As boring as it may be, eating well is a vitally important idea and there is simply not enough good art made about it. That may have changed somewhat. The Humboldt Food Policy Council presents a Food Films Pop-Up Festival featuring a series of short films on that very subject at the Miniplex today. There will be showings at 4 p.m. and 7 p.m., so if you have children you want to bring you should favor the earlier one to not run afoul of the 21+ bar age curfew ($12, $10 advance).

Full show listings in the Journal's Music and More grid, the Calendar and online. Bands and promoters, send your gig info, preferably with a high-res photo or two, to music@northcoastjournal.com. ●

Like nearly everyone else on the North Coast, Collin Yeo missed seeing the lunar eclipse due to weather. He lives in Arcata, where the next visible lunar eclipse will occur on July 4, 2020, because, of course, that holiday during the next election year needs an added dose of lunacy.

Gothically Feminine

An interview with Rosanne Cash

By Collin Yeo

music@northcoastjournal.com

Four-time Grammy winner and Nashville Songwriters' Hall of Fame inductee Rosanne Cash plays with John Leventhal at the Arkley Center for the Performing Arts on Jan. 25 at 8 p.m. The Journal interviewed her by phone from Nashville about her newest album She Remembers Everything and her relationship with writing.

North Coast Journal: What was going on in your career when you made She Remembers Everything and why did you choose the collaborators you used?

Rosanne Cash: Many were people I've known a long time. Sam Phillips and I have known each other for about 30 years. John Leventhal is my husband and he's my musical partner. As far as Elvis [Costello] and Kris [Kristofferson], I've known Kris since I was a teenager and Elvis for 25 years.

As far as what was going on, I had made three records in a row that were themed records, The River and the Thread, The List and Black Cadillac, and people were like, "You need to make another themed record, they are successful," and that was the last thing I wanted to do. I needed so badly to get back to my next 10 songs as a personal songwriter. These are all personal songs. At this point in my life I felt like I have a lot to say, I have less time to say it. I think these songs have a distinctly feminine perspective and some of them are kind of gothic. Gothically feminine (laughs) and you know they're all from experience.

NCJ: You said these were personal songs. What were you thinking and feeling when you wrote the title song "She Remembers Everything?"

RC: I was feeling a lot of rage, to tell you the truth. This was prior to the #MeToo movement but it was prescient in some way. I was thinking about trauma and how we spend our lives trying to accommodate trauma or get away from it, deny it. And who we were before the trauma happened. Like what direction would our lives have taken? I was thinking about myself but really about women. And that's how the first line came to me: "Who knows who she used to be before it all went dark?" And the rest of it, it doesn't have a linear narrative but it's about urgency and disturbance and trying to burst out of yourself. And hiding and where you can get comfort. That's what the lyrics are about. And I asked Sam Phillips if she would write the music. And I felt she wrote the perfect melody for it because it has the same kind of urgency as the lyrics.

NCJ: You have written before that when you write songs, you tend to write the lyrics first. Was that true here?

RC: It's mostly true. I often write songs with someone else writing the music. When I do write the music a lot of times it starts with a melody in my head and it goes from there.

NCJ: You wrote a piece for The New York Times more than a decade ago about recovering from brain surgery and grief from loss of loved ones, in which you mentioned your songwriting engine getting turned back on after a long period. Is this a common theme in your life?

RC: You know I think that one thing I was trying to get at in that piece is that pain can target your life and you can lose your feeling for art and love and music and everything. It is a horrible filter to see the world through.

But sometimes, for very good reasons, the engine gets turned off. Sometimes after having a baby I wouldn't write for a year or two. And rightly so. The baby takes all of your creative energy and the baby deserves that. And the first time I thought,

Rosanne Cash.

"Oh my god I'll never write again!" And the next time I thought, "Oh, this is a cycle, it comes back around."

And then there have been other times when there has been physical pain and things like that. And then there are worse reasons, like when I get too busy (laughs). It's very hard for me to write on the road. I don't do it that much.

NCJ: Have you been to Humboldt County before, and what can your fans here expect from the show?

RC: I think I have been to the county but I don't believe I have ever played Eureka, unless I am forgetting something from 35 years ago.

This is a duo, me and John Leventhal — he is my partner and also he produced and co-wrote five tracks on the album. It's an intimate show, has a lot of energy, a lot of fun. We're going to be doing new songs, as well as going back into my catalog. It's very musical. John is a tremendous musician. He really carries it. He sounds like a band.

I can't wait to see it. Eureka has always seemed kind of exotic. ●

Derby Underway

Hip check yourself. What are you doing this Saturday night? After more than 10 years of rolling hard, the Humboldt Roller Derby darlings are back for more skating action in 2019, rolling out their first game of the season — a double header — on Jan. 26 at 6 p.m. at Redwood Acres Fairgrounds ($15, $12 advance, free for ages 10 and under). If you haven't been yet, make 2019 the year you do. Saturday's games should provide all the skating, slamming, jamming roller action you need to get hooked. Humboldt Roller Derby's home teams, the North Jetty Bettys and the Widow Makers face off for this bout with a second game featuring Root Force vs. the Sis-Q Rollerz from Oregon. Double fun for your money.

Don't have time to eat before the game? Fear not. While the skaters whip around the track, maintain your cheering stamina by carbing up on pizza from Paul's Live From New York, an assortment of franks from Humboldt Hot Dogs, burritos from Carmela's, treats from Los Bagels and Ramones, and beer from Six Rivers, Mad River, Eel River and Lost Coast breweries.

All games take place in Franchesci Hall on the fairgrounds. Doors are at 5 p.m. These family-friendly sporting events take place through October. Check www.humboldtrollerderby.com for advance ticket info and full 2019 schedule. Roll on!

Dream Weavers

If it twirls, swirls, inspires and fires your imagination, chances are it started with a little ink.

After 40 years of "weaving the Arts into the fabric of our community," the dreamers at the Ink People Center for the Arts are coming together with the community for its 40th anniversary party. Tapestry of Dreams, happening Saturday, Jan. 26 from 6 to 9 p.m. at Forever Found ($65), celebrates the Ink People's four decades of bringing art to Humboldt and helping launch countless artistic projects through its DreamMaker Program, as well as helping area youth express themselves creatively through the center's MARZ Project.

The celebration showcases some of the very best in local artistic expression with performances by DreamMaker projects, including Circus of the Elements, live music, aerial silk acrobatics, dance performances, comedy and Tarot readings, plus stories from 40 years of the Ink People with cofounder Libby Maynard and friends. Food and signature cocktails from the Inky Fingers Bar will be available and more fun is in store. Help the Ink People celebrate a legacy of art on the North Coast and see the impact it can make in your life and community. The Favourite and If Beale Street Could Talk

Reviews

THE FAVOURITE. Lanthimos is a writer and director of comedies not for the faint of heart. He makes movies I find hilarious; others seem to come away despondent at their misanthropy and absurdity. Some might call what he does psychological horror. But to me, the critical distinction lies in his emphasis on humor as a vital and inextricable element of the human experience — a highly nutritive leavening agent that makes his work more satisfying both as entertainment and as commentary. His latest finds him stretching out more than ever — which is saying something, given the high-concept but unassuming world-creation in his work — with a period piece about England in the early 18th century.

The nation is at war with France, though the conflict is but background noise to the drama playing out in the court of Queen Anne (Olivia Colman). She, sickly and weakened by indulgence, addled by tragedy, perhaps a bit dull, if we're being honest, isn't much of a ruler by conventional standards. She spends much of her time tending to her rabbits (surrogate children, really, but no spoilers), eating things that don't agree with her, vomiting and shrieking at her domestics. She leans heavily on her closest confidante, Lady Sarah Marlborough (Rachel Weisz), a shrewd and well-placed viper, when it comes to important decisions of governance. The arrangement suits them both, as it allows Anne to remain a figurehead while withdrawing ever further into the recesses of her memory, as Sarah enjoys the trappings of power with none of the risky exposure.

The balance is upset, though, by the arrival of Abigail (Emma Stone), purported a cousin of Sarah's, a lady of noble birth whose father's bad habits have cost her both title and innocence (she having been sold in payment of a gambling debt to a corpulent German). She enters the palace humbly, muddled and hoping for employment. Sarah assigns her to the scullery, where she finds herself universally disliked and cruelly pranked. But Abigail is nothing if not resourceful. She gradually carries favor both with Sarah and the queen, soon enough becoming indispensable to each. She also ingratiates herself to a potential suitor (Joe Alwyn) and a mincing political powerhouse (Nicholas Hoult). As she gathers her strength, it becomes clear that she is a powerful and equally ambitious adversary to Sarah.

Shot entirely on location in and around insanely appointed British manor houses of the period, The Favourite presents life among the elites of the period with an unflinching eye for detail, both in the design of the physical environment and the grotesquerie of the human behavior therein. Lanthimos, with cinematographer Robbie Ryan, deploys the camera dolly and the fish-eye lens to exquisite effect, simultaneously conveying a sense of ridiculous vastness and punishing claustrophobia. It's a gorgeously arrayed and photographed affair, acted with devastating timing by an impeccable cast (Hoult stands out with a particularly cutting comedic turn). It lives in the dark places; the movie's greatest achievement may be in transcending setting with insights into the venality and status-chasing in humanity at large. R. 119M. BROADWAY, MILL CREEK, MINOR.

IF BEALE STREET COULD TALK. Barry Jenkins makes beautiful movies; that much is indisputable. His Moonlight (2016) is a clear-eyed, unsentimental examination of easily sentimentalized material. He is an artist with a distinct point of view and sense of style, with something to say about the human condition and contemporary America. He's also got a couple of Oscars on his mantle and enough clout to follow Moonlight with, one assumes, whatever project he chooses.

And If Beale Street Could Talk has an air of unfettered ambition about it: the release of years of rumination on a text that's a cornerstone of one's experience and philosophies (Jenkins adapted James Baldwin's novel). The scope of the narrative is deceptively small but closer examination reveals a wide-ranging, knotty thing — a difficult adaptation to pull off and one I'm not sure is entirely successful.

In early 1970s New York City, a young couple, having known each other all their lives, have fallen in love and gotten pregnant. But shortly thereafter he, Alonzo/Fonny (Stephan James) is wrongly imprisoned and she, Tish (KiKi Layne), with the help of her formidable family (played with tremendous humor and power by Regina King, Colman Domingo and Teyonah Parris), sets out to exonerate him. The futility of their efforts is heartbreakingly palpable — one theme of the piece being blackness in America as a prison sentence in itself — but dissipated by the undercurrent of love and support the characters share.

The movie is lyrically composed, with the camera moving as if carried on the constant swelling score, and the performances,

"Leave me alone I will dog walk you."

The Favourite

particularly the leads, are remarkably strong and entirely authentic. But somehow, for all its beauty, Beale Street doesn't achieve the intimacy it's working toward. R. 119M. MINOR.

Cancer, Part 2: Turtles, Birds and Rabbits

By Barry Evans

fieldnotes@northcoastjournal.com

Last week, we looked at some of the many reasons why the diagnosis and treatment of cancer are so difficult and controversial. A common way of illustrating the problem is the “turtle-bird-rabbit” analogy. Although it can equally well apply to breast cancer (the most common cancer in women), here I'll discuss it in relation to prostate cancer (the second most common in men, after lung cancer).

In a nutshell: About one man in seven will be diagnosed with prostate cancer; one in 39 will die of it; and 80 percent of us who reach age 80 have it. What the heck? Why aren't more men dying from prostate cancer if so many of us guys have it? To answer that graphically, urologist Dr. Frank Hinman divided newly diagnosed prostate cancer patients into one of three groups: turtles, birds and rabbits.

Turtles are patients with a very slow growing, ain't-going-anywhere tumor. So slow, in fact, that had they not been diagnosed, the outcome would be the same: They'd die of another cause, blissfully ignorant of the cancer cells in their prostate. The diagnosis, in this case, didn't help.

Birds are at the opposite end of the spectrum: Diagnosis came too late. Their prostate cancer cells — the birds — have already flown the coop. Their cancer has metastasized (spread to other organs) and is beyond treatment. In this case, diagnosis didn't help either.

Rabbits sit in the middle. A man with rabbit cancer cells may still be curable — doctors can catch those cells before they metastasize. Diagnosis, in this case, is useful.

So, screening makes total sense if you're a rabbit but won't help if you're a turtle or bird. No one wants to go through the trauma and expense of unnecessary surgery, but this is what happens when doctors operate on either a turtle or a bird. If you're being treated, both you and your oncologists want to believe you're a rabbit and that the procedure will save your life.

It's called the “hypothetical rabbit problem” because the rabbit may not exist. Most of the time, doctors are either operating unnecessarily on turtles (whose cancer would never have been a problem) or uselessly on birds (whose surgery is futile, too little and too late). How to know which, while the patient is alive and treatable? (Autopsies give the final word.) The best oncologists can do is to assign probabilities based on the patient's age, health, medical history, family history, etc. This method, apparently, isn't much better than a crapshoot when pitted against an enemy that's devious, stealthy, fast-moving and — in the case of turtles — may best be left alone.

We'll never totally eliminate cancer from our lives — that's the price we pay as multicellular organisms. And chemotherapy and radiation treatments actually increase the rate of mutation, with potentially deadly results. Instead of thinking of our relationship with cancer as a winnable war against an enemy that can be defeated, research is now starting to focus on living with, but managing the foe, as has been done with HIV.

We must also accept the fact that cancer isn't a “mechanical” disease like stroke and heart attack, which are likely to be virtually curable in the future. Cancer is here to stay and will — if you survive everything else and live to a ripe old age — get you in the end.

Barry Evans (barryevans9@yahoo.com) loves turtles, gets on OK with rabbits and wants to avoid birds.

NOTICE TO POTENTIAL BIDDERS: If you are considering bidding on this property lien, you should understand that there are risks involved in bidding at a trustee auction. You will be bidding on a lien, not on the property itself. Placing the highest bid at a trustee auction does not automatically entitle you to free and clear ownership of the property. You should also be aware that the lien being auctioned off may be a junior lien. If you are the highest bidder at the auction, you are or may be responsible for paying off all liens senior to the lien being auctioned off, before you can receive clear title to the property. You are encouraged to investigate the existence, priority, and size of outstanding liens that may exist on this property by contacting the county recorder's office or a title insurance company, either of which may charge you a fee for this information. If you consult either of these resources, you should be aware that the same lender may hold more than one mortgage or deed of trust on the property. NOTICE TO PROPERTY OWNER: The sale date shown on this notice of sale may be postponed one or more times by the mortgagee, beneficiary, trustee, or a court, pursuant to Section 2924g of the California Civil Code. The law requires that information about trustee sale postponements be made available to you and to the public, as a courtesy to those not present at the sale.
